interview to The Echo Of India in his office in Durgapur.

Prof Hirani makes it clear that it is a R&D venture in its preliminary stages and several proposals may have to be studied and integrated wherever feasible and desirable so as to ensure that ultimately people find it interesting and are able to appreciate its novel features. When the technology is developed and is found to be technology is developed and is found to the composition of transfer of technology will arise.

Our initial feedback is that the concept when translated into reality and when it reaches the stage of commercial production, the corporate sector will come forward to manufacture solar trees. Our job is to complete the R&D venture and invite companies to take the process forward. It will be their job to promote the product. We will try to involve a number of companies with the manufacture of solar trees. That is our thinking at this stage.

The cost of a solar tree will be firmed up in due course. It will depend on the items that go into its manufacture and wherefrom state of the contract of the contr
